James Smith was a bad man, at least everybody said so, and that must be true. Though he was an accommoduling neighbor, and went to meeting Sundays, and had been known to tell his experience, the wickedness of which drew many a sigh and great from the pious old dencous. He used to drop a dime into the contribution boxes and sunctimes a quarter, but then that wasn't all. He was said to be guilty of paying more attention to a couple of sparkling black eyes, than to devout teachings of the minister, and the sigh which now and then escaped his breast, was not exactly of a go-to-meeting character. Kats Hopkine had the eyes above alluded to, (how I hate such eyes,) and had a good bringing up, but they were a leede too black and mischievous for the welfare of her heart. She boarded at James' house. (James was a mar ried man). She, too, went to meering regular, but was particularly fond of going evenings. Mrs. Smith staid at home then, and took charge of three or four little early headed children.-Mrs. Smith began to think, (though she didn't ray anything about it) that ! her husband was getting pious rather too fast, or that the minister preached better sermons to the evening than daytimes. Mrs. Smith was an 'observing' woman, and had noticed that James and Kate would come home about. I did not say that Mrs. Smith: he should not probably be at home to tainly lad some very strange freaks .-- ; One Sunday evening just before meet ing was out, she thought she would check, which time found Smith at the had disappeared entirely. Presently steady measured tread of old men with thick boots, and young men with their of still smaller ones, which made such, a racket she like to have run but she

It was soon still, however, and no one had disturbed the gate! Shel could not have been mistaken in this, for she was close by it, and it never growling noise, as though it listed to be disturbed. Hark! the careful step of a man approaches and the patting of a little gaiter boot falls softly on the night air! It nears, though slowly, and the quick bearing cars of Mrs. Smith caught something like the sound of mulled whispers. They came nearer, and finally stopped. Mrs. Smith held her breath, while Mr. Smith turned his back towards her, leaning partially against the fence, and Kate, as near as she could see, leaning partielly on him. Oh that her ears had been deaf, that her little thustering heart was not susceptible of such agitation. Was she in her right mind! or had some wild fancy taken possession of her thoughts? She was not crazy, and her ears could not well misunderstand at reaching distance. Smith spote first, after a moment's

"There is but one thing left for us

"And that? softly whispered his companion, clinging closely to him all the while."

" Fly! fly with me-dearest, away from this unhappy spot, where I can pour out my love at your feet, and forever bask in the sunshine of your; charms. The world will be nought. to me unless I can clasp you to my heart, and not feel the pleasure to be momentary and fleeting."

"I am yours forever, sighed Kate, leaning her head upon his shoulder, and whatever be your wishes, I will only he too happy in obeying them."

" To morrow night then, answered James, you will meet me at the foot of the lane, at ten o'clock, where I wi'l have a carriage in readiness, and ere the night d was upon as will be out of reach of hum or danger from Nancy, and I shall not care for any one else."

"I will be there at the hour," said Kate, " and now we must go in or Nancy will be uneasy."

But before they disturbed the ugly gate, Smith drew Julia to his heart in | Post, 2d inst.

one ford loving embrace, and so ck went a kiss upon her opturned lips.-As Smith turned around he though he saw something flash.

The old gate swung upon its rusty hinges, and the lovers took the path leading to the back door. Mrs. Smith heard his last charge to Kite, to be punctual at the hour, and hastily ran to the from door, and by the time they had gain d the back door she was comfereably rocking in her arm chair as unconcerned as though nothing had

That night Smith dreuned lovely dreams, how he would fly with the idal of his affections, and evade the search of those whose re-eageful dispasari as would terpt them to follow, but Mrs. Smith dreamed how he worldn't, and how much he would rep at of ever having ventured upon so hazardous an experiment; and how ergies to the establishment of his new proliable were human hopes to blast, and jeet, on a sure and unfailing basis. The the fourlest dr. ams to vanish in thin consequence of which has been, that alair. But how to frustrate his plans though the Co. Gent. commenced with evwas the question. Sie didn't sleep when she dreamed, but she decided been wanted on the part of its publishers to npon a plan of action, and then drop- go on impraving it, both in its value as a reped herself in the arms of morpheus. She arose early, prepared a good breakfast, and expressed herself quite uneasy about Smith's health, as his appetite seemed to be very poor, and had lied on its teachings with more confidence be a getting so for some time past .-- than those from any other source, especially that day, and had not Nancy been in al corps, and a literary connection at the secret, she would have taken his slower than the rest of the congrega- attentions for genuine love. Mrs. Smith was sorry but conida't help it.

Night came on and so did ten o'while away a few minutes just to kill foot of the lane. A female form time by sitting under a grape vine by etosely enveloped sprang into his carthe gate. It was a warm night—the ringe, and Smith embracing her foundly, new moon too small to stay up late, drove off as rapidly as his fast horse would carry them. On, on they drove, costs. Appealed. the sound of funisteps were heard, the actinging to each other in all the tenkiss every now and then from the bust new calf skins, and the stamping meetar lips which only spoke in sighing whispers.

> Smith declared it the happiest moment in his life; and she only auswered his loving protestations with a the sum of $300. warmer embrace.

Smith longed for the light once, fin.d $20 and costs. Committed. more, that he might look into ber love-nemning eyes and read the tender thought she could not speak. Light did come at last, and when the faintest streak of crimson tinged the eastern hills with a mellow light, Smith sought once more to feast his eyes unon those sparkling orbs which captivated han at the meetings. He took hold of her dimple chin and turned fire guilty, fixed $10 and costs. Paid. her face lovingly up to his, and -O horrors! Nancy was looking him straight in the facel. Smith jumped a fact off the seat, dropped the lines, which Nancy chught; he tried to say something; but his tongue clove to the roof of his month. Namey reg-

"Look into my loving eyes Jim at Jim wouldn't do it, atthough she celared it to be "the Lappacst moment in her life."

"James," said she, "do you see that house youder? that is mine and if you have no objections, "we will spend the first night there."

Nancy had slyly turned the horse on a different road in the right direction to reach her home again about day-light. I never could learn from Mrs. Smith what Jim said when he did speak, but she says he is the best man she ever saw. But Nancy did tell ene wrong story, she came longe from a cell just before it was time for Kate to start, crying with tears in her eyes that her hoshad had got thrown from his bringy and nearly killed, and that she brings are not seen to be a first of the assembly in the range of him. To the Billion of the News.—In the answer of the heart-broken page in "Hore Lealies" "Yes, lady I have lost my way," there was always something to me of deep and touching significance. And how many do we need with on the great crowded pathway of the who have lost their pay, with no friendly hard to lead them back again. On that we who are all children of the same Pather looked towards each other with a more genial sympathy, a more friendly carrier tooked towards each other with a more genial sympathy, a more friendly carrier took of a more friendly carrier took.

It is sad, it is very sal to think how the records of a few evil that will effect from the remembrance of our fellow-men long years of enthern methods. The fact that each one of us has before him the colume of his one broken resolutions and off repeated sits, should shorely lead us to judge mercifully.—That temptation which besets us so easily, if it had been indulged in a little further; if the internettances by which we were surrounded had only been indulged in a little further; if the internettances by which we were surrounded had only been indulged in a little further; if the internet how more than to consider the carrier to be an armony of the and the principles it in a latter, are saily at variance with the carrier and helies to among the area with the carrier, and have somewhat to inturit the thoir faining souls.
